Thiene, where the mirror reveals the most beautiful villa

Little Julia squeezed her daddy's hand tightly, as if asking for reassurance against the emotion growing inside her. Beyond the gate of Via San Francesco, in Thiene, there was more than just a house. There was a world. She had read the story of Snow White so many times that she could smell the scent of apples and the rustle of dwarfs' clothes in the leaves. And now, there she was, with her heart pounding in her chest, almost expecting to see one of the dwarfs appear from a bush. The mansion stood before her like a castle from modern fairy tales, and behind her, majestic and solemn, the Cathedral of Thiene silhouetted against the sky. To Julia it seemed like a magical mountain, a gentle giant made of stone, watching over the secret garden. With a small jerk, she let go of her father's hand and climbed the access staircase, her steps light on the stone. The balcony that ran along one side of the house instantly became her patrol path, from which a princess could scan the horizon of her kingdom. Beyond the large, dark wooden doorway, massive and ancient, the anticipation dissolved into silent amazement. She found herself in a very long hallway, so bright that it seemed to be traversed by a sun of its own. Light danced across the floor and went to illuminate, at the far end, the elegant curve of a grand staircase. But that was not what stole her gaze. On the wall, a huge mirror with a carved, antique frame caught every reflection. "Look, Dad!" she whispered, her voice a mixture of reverence and excitement. "It's like the Queen's! The one that talks!" He approached slowly, almost on tiptoe. In the glitter of the glass, his image smiled at her, but for a moment, a distorted reflection showed her not only her parents behind her, but the rooms that opened like doors to parallel worlds: the living room, spacious and airy, a theater of light; the sitting room, cozy, with its large window that was a living picture of the garden. But it was as she passed through the dining room door that her breathing stopped. A large wooden table, solid and majestic, towered in the center. "All seven dwarfs can fit here!" she exclaimed, turning in on herself with open arms....
